

“I personally, the position of my administration, as well as a lot of the companies here, is that you don't want to start getting a differentiation in how accessible the Internet is to different users.”

--President Obama, August 5, 2014

Dear FCC Commissioners Wheeler, Clyburn, Rosenworcel, Pai, and O'Rielly:

Yesterday, Tuesday, August 5, 2014, President Obama said:

One of the issues around net neutrality is whether you are creating different rates or charges for different content providers. That's the big controversy here.

So you have big, wealthy media companies who might be willing to pay more and also charge more for spectrum, more bandwidth on the Internet so they can stream movies faster.

I personally, the position of my administration, as well as a lot of the companies here, is that you don't want to start getting a differentiation in how accessible the Internet is to different users.

You want to leave it open so the next Google and the next Facebook can succeed.

This is the president's first public statement on Net Neutrality since the Commissioners voted this May to advance a proposal that threatens the open Internet. President Obama appointed all five FCC commissioners. The only way to avoid the danger that President Obama warns against is to treat the Internet as a public utility, by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service under Title II of the Communications Act.

Sincerely,

MoveOn.ORG
POLITICAL ACTION®

Dear FCC Commissioners Wheeler, Clyburn, Rosenworcel, Pai and O'Rielly:

On August 5, 2014, President Obama said "One of the issues around net neutrality is whether you are creating different rates or charges for different content providers.

That's the big controversy here.

So you have big, wealthy media companies who might be willing to pay more and also charge more for spectrum, more bandwidth on the Internet so they can stream movies faster.

I personally, the position of my administration, as well as a lot of the companies here, is that you don't want to start getting a differentiation in how accessible the Internet is to different users.

You want to leave it open so the next Google and the next Facebook can succeed."

This is the president's first public statement on Net Neutrality since the Commissioners voted this May to advance a proposal that threatens the open Internet. President Obama appointed all five FCC commissioners. The only way to avoid the danger that President Obama warns against is to treat the Internet as a public utility, by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service under Title II of the Communications Act

Sincerely,

A solid black rectangular box used to redact the signature of the sender.

Dear FCC Commissioners Wheeler, Clyburn, Rosenworcel, Pai and O'Rielly:

On Tuesday, August 5, 2014, in his first public statement on Net Neutrality since the Commissioners voted this May to advance a proposal that threatens the open Internet, President Obama warned against "creating different rates or charges for different content providers" so that you don't "start getting a differentiation in how accessible the Internet is to different users.

You want to leave it open so the next Google and the next Facebook can succeed."

The only way to avoid the danger that President Obama warns against is to treat the Internet as a public utility--by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service under Title II of the Communications Act.

Sincerely,

A solid black rectangular box used to redact the signature of the sender.

[REDACTED]

[REDACTED]